MEMO

Colleagues,

In yesterday's meeting, we discussed whether there is a correlation between the amount of money spent on marketing certain products and the revenue generated from those products. Currently, we can say that the connection is not very clear. We reviewed the list that compares shopper spending traits, and found some surprises. Helen Smith had to miss the meeting, but we talked afterwards. She pointed out products that experienced high sales growth.

You might intuitively feel that we have to spend more money on our products experiencing the lowest sales. However, I think it would be better instead to increase marketing support for our products experiencing the highest sales.

If a product category is experiencing weak sales, I do not think that more advertising alone can improve the situation. Instead, we have to look at other factors, such as quality or price. That is what I tried to stress to Evan Lee, who unexpectedly but fortunately was able to join the meeting. He seemed to agree with my analysis. In any event, I have attached a report detailing this idea, which I'd like to discuss at our next meeting. I don't think that we should put it off until the last gathering of the month.

Thank you,

Brenda Phan
